Reviews the Postal Service's (USPS) efforts to improve employee working conditions and the overall performance of the USPS since the 1994 report which identified persistent labor-management relations problems and recommended improvements. Determines the status and results of the USPS's progress in implementing 10 specific recommendations and identifies approaches that could help the USPS and its unions and management assoc. achieve consensus on how to deal with these problems. Appendices include a description of the grievance/arbitration process and comments from USPS management assoc. and labor unions and assoc.

This informative work critically examines the political and economic causes of change in the U.S. Post Office while vividly revealing the problematic nature of work in contemporary organizations. Vern K. Baxter presents an in-depth case study, addressing the important theoretical issues related to employment, industry restructuring, technology, and the political process of change. The volume will be invaluable for researchers and professionals interested in the sociology of work and organizations and in public administration.
